The Uranium One Deal

How President Barack Obama and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton aided Russia's quest for global nuclear dominance

In 2010, the Obama administration granted approval to Russia's Uranium One with the promise of a major treaty in Uranium One. The deal was controversial because it would provide the largest foreign acquisition in the United States at the time of $1.35 billion for 80 percent of the company.

The deal was approved by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS), which includes the State Department, the Commerce Department, and the Treasury Department. The deal was also supported by the Obama administration, which was seeking to improve relations with Russia.

The deal was opposed by U.S. senators, who were concerned about Russia's ties to terrorist organizations and its nuclear proliferation efforts.

In 2015, the FBI began an investigation into the Uranium One deal, which resulted in the resignation of FBI Director James Comey.

The investigation into the Uranium One deal was ongoing for several years, and it was eventually determined that the FBI had not received sufficient evidence to warrant further investigation.

In 2016, the Department of Justice announced that it had concluded its investigation into the Uranium One deal and had not found any evidence of wrongdoing.

In 2018, the Department of Justice announced that it had ended its investigation into the Uranium One deal and had not found any evidence of wrongdoing.
